On the other hand, other megabanks---Bank of New York Mellon, Royal Bank of Canada, Toronto Dominion Bank, Bank of Montreal, CIBC, Bank of America, Deutsche Bank, Credit Suisse and Wells Fargo to cite nine---are openly stated as major holders in various PM miners (in some cases, “second tier major holders”). However, funds notably Van Eck own much more than these banks. Morgan Stanley, State Street Corporation and Goldman Sachs stated as major holders far exceed JPMC (according to Yahoo Finance). Yes, the commercial banks and the investment banks and the funds all own shares in each other, far more tangled than any cypress tree roots in a Louisiana swamp. Barclays, not Morgan Chase, is the best bank example of holdings in a bewilderingly extensive roster of corporations!

Following the Silver Purchase Act of June 1934 and EO 6814 seizing silver in August 1934, the U.S. Treasury accumulated several billion silver ounces. We know it was used more for silver price limitation management than for coinage issues. Could Morgan Chase Bank have acquired silver with similar intentions? Not in Ted's one track mental galaxy; but time will reveal all. Someday a turning point must be reached and those massively short silver should anticipate change to sidestep being incinerated. Is that time in 2019? Possibly. I felt that way in 2000. I had a lot to learn.

I want to ask a basic question about Ted's idea/notion/belief/conclusion/theory/speculation, conjecture and hypothesis (or finding can we see better documentation please) that JPMC Bank holds 850MOZ silver as he recently declared. At $15 the ounce that's $12.75 billion. We know this Canadian mogul Eric Sprott holds lots of hard PM and a trainload of mining shares. Sprott would regard it as bad strategy for himself and the cautious resource investors he leads, to not hold both bullion for maximum security and mining company shares for maximum leverage. Is JPMC Bank at least as smart as Eric Sprott, as regards metals and mining? Very likely so, regardless that the pitchfork tail is the bank's appendage. If JPMC intended to go long silver, why wouldn't it also be long miners by holding shares like other megabanks?

Yes, Morgan Chase may hold lots of mining shares by means of “nominees.” This I don’t know and question that Ted could verify it. On the surface it appears JPMC is much less interested than certain other sizeable banks in holding shares. Now as to shares being no good compared to metal, that friends is bunkum. As long as ownership of public companies must be expressed and must be tradable, shares will remain a reality. There has to be a way to buy interests in public companies; there has to be a way to divest interests of them. That there could be a disruption to trading does not signify a cancellation. Many metals sellers have misled buyers away from shares and in so doing these pied piper followers have missed chances to end up with much more hard metal than they have since all they ever bought is hard metal! Look at the run-ups of October 2007 and April 2011 especially---shares contrasted to bullion. Cashing out of shares (or stopping out) at or near those peaks and redeploying funds into hard stuff would have netted investors several times more bullion, than had they been buying bullion only all along! Sellers avoid whisper of that fact as their business plan is to grab your money ASAP. Bullion and coin is wonderful, but the leverage is less than better shares.

Some personalities have no qualms as to giving you advice that boosts their interests at the expense of your own; beware! You can’t find anywhere I said “shares only” or “bullion only” or “90% coin only” and absolutely not “numismatics only,” that field is too tricky for the 99.5%. Protect yourself; be discreet. Don’t boast on You Tube or message boards about how much of something you have; absolutely no bumper stickers nor license plate frames nor T shirts with messages making yourself a target. Don't tempt neighbors or co-workers either. I did that as a boy in 1965 and had 500 Mercury dimes stolen.

I haven't noticed Ted concurring with a wilder voice that JPMC held silver is Chinese owned. As stated last time, silver is too strategic for China to hold it on the soil of a potential major adversary. Why can't people see the painfully obvious?

It may be that Chase (it is NOT "JP Morgan," he's been dead a very long time) holds silver as I said last time out, only to dump silver for continual price capping. Defending the Federal Reserve may matter more to Chase than making gains long silver! JPMC has the strongest linkage to the Federal Reserve of any bank. If this plays out, the mining companies also will be price capped as to share price potential, and investors will continue being robbed every day of their fair net worth being expressed. Regulators are a joke, they only regulate small offenders. If this is the price managers plan, mineral resources will be mined out at depressed rates. So many mining execs and directors came by way of a Royal school of this or that, or a Queens college, no wonder they have no complaints to express. Lots of Goldman Sachs, Morgan Stanley and other such soulless bleak linkage is found in these people's bios. But what else could these companies do for financing other than to have such connections?

Shareholders, see your company's websites and read the bios of execs and directors. When you find "Royal" this or "Queens" that, notify the IR department you feel this is part of the problem as to why mining companies won't speak out against this hateful COMEX lowballing of silver! Place it on message boards! The Queen thinks .9999 silver should be price capped at $5 Canadian; proof of this is on silver Maple Leaf coins! She also thinks gold should be capped at $50 based on the one ounce Canadian Maple Leaf coin design. So will the menacing old devil hag tell the price managers to readjust the silver to gold ratio from near 90 to one down to ten to one? What a laugh.

I certainly do accept that Ted's long theory may be right, but Ted has antiquated horse carriage blinders tightly strapped on insisting the only reason Chase (JPMC) could possibly have for holding silver is to be long. So while I accept that of two theories 1) Chase has silver for price capping to defend the FED dollar at least domestically and 2) Chase may have realized the world tide can't be combated much longer, and will finally go long after generations of price management, Ted can see only the one possibility. This matter of his being connected to a bullion seller has something to do with his 50% perspective.

For Chase to hold silver down depends on them and their many allies having enough gold to block meaningful gold price advances. Gold prices get beyond reach of many, they'll turn to silver. Now we see "25 Year Chart Shows Commercials Wildly Bullish on Silver” with an accompanying warning “do not get cute and try to time the market.”

Being perma bulls in metals has been a risky religion. Many have been hurt by guru predictions; the predictions are bait to get your money for (purported) “premium content;” the predictions fail, your money is gone due to you fell for a personality con game spitting out price and timing predictions as hooking lures. Watch out for any prospect of overt Federal interference in metals prices. Desperate animals will lash out viciously. If industrial silver users can’t get enough silver, they’ll have their pets in the U.S. Congress legislate for a silver grab. They’d look for a way to sidestep the unexpected February 2019 Supreme Court ruling giving more protection to private property. COMEX silver capping is building to shortages; we didn’t cause any shortage; but media will be fast to blame us. Why would they blame advertisers? Overlapping ownership guarantees media bias. The government doesn’t run the finance institutions, its the other way around. Fines to these banks only serve to hide this fact, and when are the fines close to the size of what the fines were for?

Typical instance of media prioritizing trivial matters while denying the public info on major situations impacting their lives? Texas media figure Dave Lieber who was worried about cup sizes at Starbucks!

Of course, silver suppression works only as long as gold suppression works. A supply has to be available for capping, it can't all be derivatives. Meantime all possible schemes will be floated to draw investors away from PM. We could even see a Grand Canyon Corporation scheme. People! I do not KNOW how this will play out; don't expect that others do either, regardless they get unlimited easy coverage at so many sites like Silver Seek, Silver Doctors, 24 Hour Gold and GATA; holding silver at May 2019 prices should be fairly safe regardless; reason being they don't want to stifle miners to the extent that their output stops; but there is no voice in PM long community who can guarantee what JPMC Bank will do with silver as we move forward, assuming it has thus and such amount of silver. If they have substantial silver, they likely have some significant gold also.

Yes! If the stock market takes a really big hit, it should benefit precious metals. I prefer for all our sakes that Ted's idea about JPMC is right, but caution that we must allow for a conflicting possibility. If the dollar takes severe blows with major trading partners, that could finally energize silver. JPMC may have silver for self preservation. I admit to Ted's idea possibly being right. But there remains till disproved, this shadier possibility!

<https://www.thetechnicaltraders.com/extended-gold-mega-base-could-prompt-an-incredible-rally/> I felt was a worthwhile read, with less sense of spreading false hope than most. I am grateful to not be insulted by meaningless drivel like "shemitah."

I am not wanting to express pessimism but realism. JPMC is a thoroughly sinful organization staffed with strychnine mentalities and it's not there to be our friend. I feel they are there to hold silver down as many months and years as possible; that is not a prediction, but an intuitive insight I'd like to think is wrong because like most longs denial makes me more comfortable. I want to believe a major price rise, and a sustained one, is close by. But hope won't end the short corner. Their history and the shady history of all the tributary finance institutions dating back in time to the early 1820s that gave rise to JPMC says there is a profound hatred in that intermarried community of interest against silver, the common man's money! Many of you should make sensible plans as to the disposition of your assets in the event you don't live to see a metals bull market. Religiously the dynasties behind our megabanks are overwhelmingly Episcopalian; not Jewish. And Jesuits absolutely don't control regardless that they wish they could. Episcopalians are the USA version of Anglican Church of England; Sir Francis Drake first stole gold and silver in sea raids from Catholic Spain in 1572! Looming large though very silent over the megabanks are many of the original colonial families from England in the 1600s. This is not any “Rothschild only” world! Russell Pennoyer is a senior advisor to Brittany Capital Group, joining in 2014 after twenty years with Benedetto, Gartland & Company, a leading private equity placement agent, where he was a partner and ultimately president.

He has extensive experience raising capital for private equity, venture capital, and hedge funds from institutional investors throughout the world. Pennoyer was previously an executive with an independent oil and gas company and an associate at the law firm Davis Polk & Wardwell LLP.

Pennoyer is chairman of The William T. Grant Foundation, president of the Achelis and Bodman Foundation, and a trustee of the New-York Historical Society and the Hudson Institute.

Paul Pennoyer was with White & Case, Major Wall Street law firm repping for Pilgrims Society dynasties, investment & megabanks--- (his daddy was also A Pilgrims member!) --- Brittany Capital (lots of big hedge funds) with which Russell Pennoyer is associated is in the 666 Fifth Avenue Building NYC; it's owned by other members, notably Howland Donaldson Murphy. Ever hear of the Howlands? Their history is amazing. Many dynasties are involved in globalism, warmongering and monetary metals suppression. Everything does not trace to the Rothschilds only. That's like saying there's only one jungle animal that can hurt you. "J.P. Morgan Senior and Junior were just Rothschild agents," nonsense. They handled finances for many dynasties from the Campbell Soup Dorrances to the Berwinds (planet's biggest coal operators in the day), James B. Haggin who trounced the Rothschilds six times in the world copper and gold markets and dozens of others.

I sure hope Dave Janda can get credit for bringing you this information as he does deserve credit for other people's research!

I am not qualified as interview guest on any You Tube "alt news" channel inasmuch as the major requisite is that you must bring in something to merchandise for purchase price to audiences, since these channels are all unacknowledged sales and marketing enterprises. The goal is to draw as much money as possible from audiences; information (often wrong) is distant second priority. No guest and no interviewer to date has admitted these are paid business promotions. What does that tell you about their personal integrity? David Morgan's refusal to admit to me that he pays for interviews was a big reason I disassociated from him; his poor record of silver price calls is another. Picture that dozens of interviewers are falling all over themselves to give him free business boosting sessions so he can collect $497 to $997 from as many people as possible; that is what we're being asked to believe; that interviewers want to grow his business, yet with no monetary incentive from him to render him this assistance! Does anyone where you live give free advertising to businesses?

I appreciate Silver Market News Online allowing me its one sounding board. I wanted to make scarce information freely available to the broad PM community. I had no idea that not being a seller of assorted wares would get me blacklisted as an interview guest! Even people with $275,000 fines for shady commodity trading practices get loads of You Tube coverage

Has Investors Hub been pestered to delete that post? Very likely.

IMHO I get the feeling that what the U.S. Government and Wall Street both fear MOST is not a true audit of the Federal Reserve, nor of Fort Knox and USA gold; no; it's that the silver price could be released from this quicksand they have it in for generations; that it would aggressively rise; and that the rise would be sustained. That alone is what they dread most. It would show a weak Federal Reserve dollar! Accordingly, if nations having friction with America would catch on to this idea and aggressively buy silver and hold it off the market, it would cause more embarrassment to the USA empire than ANYTHING else! This is hardly any appeal to "treason" as it's already treason against the Constitution that Americans were taken off silver money 54 years ago! Sure; they were still free to spend silver for face, and you can do that today still; who wants to?

Thoughts about JPMC and silver Ted alleges it holds, and its alleged plans? Ken Lewis? Bill Haynes? Haynes is a pretty good thinker but we seldom hear from him outside his site.
